When the figure abstraction is well understood, you'll find that you'll constantly change and rearrange to suit every case and every situation. The standard set of lines we start with are charts for learning - they're just one set of possibilities, a stock vocabulary that will constantly flex, grow and reinvent itself with each new image we create.

I do not stress enough that this is just a system to learn from. All systems of drawing are designed for teaching and should be left behind as soon as they're mastered, like stabik's on a bicycle. Too many carefully followed rules can lead to pictorial sterility. It's very important that we train and practice as much as possible until the rules become background noise. When we perform, we should be able to do so with total clarity and focus on the more important aspects of making a picture - the story content and for the pictorial intent.
